Alex Berger is an American advertising and marketing professional, who decided in 2007 to leave the three-month trip to Europe. The man ended up staying - and now he has lived in Copenhagen for three years.

The man maintains a Web site on which he writes phenomena, which is a non-resident will come across. Last post discusses Nordic countries, including Finland will meet to discuss, and how much it differs from the example of American-style discussion.

"The Finns are known to slow the pace of speech. They feel comfortable, even if the debate should breaks - while, for example, for us Americans that silence can be really painful and embarrassing." the man explained.

According to Berger, the American bred from an early age to avoid quiet moments. Because of this, they often are beginning to talk about as soon as an entry - causing the Finns and Scandinavians often feel such a way that their heads have walked.

According to him, the Nordic way resembles an American rhythm and the pace is often more formal discussion.

"In many cases it affects the formal debates on free-form instead of talking about them." he says.
